BRIDGE OPENING AT MEMPHIS.

May 12th, next, will witness the celebration in Memphis of the completion of one of the most important and costly enterprises in the history of the city—the formal opening to traffic of the great railroad bridge spanning the Mississippi River at the exact spot where, in May, 1541, Hernando De Soto, the intrepid Spanish Spanish "soldier explorer," in search of gold and the fabled El Dorado, emerged, with his equally ambitious and fearless followers, from the primeval forests upon Chickasaw Bluffs and first sighted the stream which he named the "River of the Holy Ghost," since romantically called the "Father of Waters."

The Memphis bridge is the only one between St. Louis and the Gulf.

The bridge is a magnificent steel and stone structure, lacking but 105 feet of being three miles in length and cost $2,500,000. The bridge is built on the Cantilever principle.

It will be a great day for Southern commerce when the old-time method of transferring trains across the Mississippi river on ferry boats is done away with. It will mean a saving to passengers of one to five hours, and in freights five to twelve hours. The celebration will prove an event in keeping with the magnitude of the enterprise, the completion of which is of such vast import. A great crowd is expected and ample accommodation awaits all who take advantage of the low railroad rates to visit Memphis.

Memphis proposes to do the honors of that occasion in a style of which every Southern citizen and American will be proud. A program which will involve the expenditure of $25,000, subscribed by the people of Memphis, has been arranged for the entertainment of visitors. The railroads will offer a very low rate for the round trip and the doors of the city will swing wide for a royal welcome to all who visit the celebration. A splendid program has been arranged.

After parading the principal streets of the city the procession will halt at the bridge the formal opening of which will be signalled by the Governors of Arkansas and Tennessee meeting at the center of the bridge and clasping hands, while the Mayor of Memphis pronounces the commercial union of the East and West by placing his hands upon their heads. The bridge will thus be dedicated to Commerce. Senator Daniel Voorhees, the distinguished orator and statesman, of Indiana, will deliver the dedicatory address, after which the procession will return to the city and disperse at Court Square. The remainder of the day will be consumed in excursions to different points of interest in and around the city.

At night there will be a grand fireworks display from the bridge and from floats on the river. All the places of amusement will be open and public balls given in different parts of the city.

This is merely an outline of the program. New features are being added as they suggest themselves.

It will be a grand gala time, and you are invited to come and bring your family.
